Introduction

Children are never too young to enjoy books. Parents and teachers play a major role in providing the opportunity for children to hear and enjoy stories and books. There is more literature available today for these young children than has ever existed before. More varied kinds, increased production and, of course, wide-spread dissemination has made thousands of books available each year to children. Books can now be purchased in supermarkets, dimestores, airports and mail order book clubs.

Today, it seems the potential of literature in the school and in the home is greater than ever before. Children see the printed word all around them constantly, on cereal boxes, billboards, signs, buildings and television. To enhance and spur their interest in the written language, children must hear stories, poems and rhymes read aloud. As Larrick says so well "Nothing draws a young child into the magic of oral language as being read to."[1]

Schools for children in grades one through twelve usually provide library personnel to select and maintain a collection of books for children. Since the staff of early learning programs does not include a media or library specialist, it then becomes the teacher's or director's responsibility to select and order needed books. Additionally, the funds for such purchases are usually nominal so it becomes common practice for teachers to use local libraries to supplement their school's library.

Selection

Selecting books for the early childhood classroom is an overwhelming task for the teacher. The number of books published annually makes it virtually impossible for the teacher to review or obtain these books. Huck advises that over 40,000 books are now available for young children.[2] Moreover, each year more than 1,000 new children's books are published in the United States and from this list, certain titles will stand out as the one's children seem to enjoy most and ask to have read to them.

Although books are written for children, it is the adult who chooses them. Parents, grandparents, and teachers select a book but how can the adult know what book a child might enjoy? The teacher must always consider the young child's needs. These needs are largely determined by his or her background, attitudes and interests. Most small children like stories about animals, machines, playmates, family and situations that reflect his own environment.

Many resource guides are available to teachers of young children. Schools have detailed reference books about every published book and newspapers, magazines and professional journals carry reviews of children's books. However, these guides are often voluminous and most often list books in far too many content areas and for all aged elementary children.

It appears that an annotated bibliography of books for young children, published in recent years, which includes appropriate practical information, is needed for teachers and parents.

Description

The following bibliography represents a selected sample of books for children aged 2-7. Most of the books listed have publication dates in the seventies and the emphasis is on the affective areas with books listed dealing with friends, death, family, ethnicity etc. Also listed are the content areas such as animals, colors, science, trucks, space, etc.

The books listed are now exclusive choices, there are many published books that are excellent but were not available or made known to this writer. The almost 300 books listed are a sample of what is available to the teacher. It will make known to educators the new authors and publishers of young children's literature. Because of the space allowed, the illustrator/s are not listed.

The List of Categories on page 4 alphabetically lists the categories of the books in this bibliography. The list beginning on page 5 lists the books alphabetically by author and includes the category, title, publisher, publication year and comments. Specifically, the list is as follows:

CATEGORY - The category listed is the general area found within a school curriculum. If, as in Self-Concept, the book deals with a specific sub-concept such as DEATH, this is noted.

TITLE - The title listed is as it would appear in a card catalog.

PUBLISHER - The publisher is listed with a five-letter abbreviation which refers the reader to the List of Publishers on page 40 .

YEAR - The copyright date is listed.

COMMENTS - This notation is an aid to help the reader better understand the book's emphasis. Comments were obtained from publisher's catalogs, bibliographies, and book lists. Each book, whenever possible, was reviewed for appropriateness for inclusion in this bibliography.

Conclusion

The problem of selecting good, well-written books for young children is always present. This bibliography is not written to replace current book lists being used by early childhood teachers but to supplement and update them. Authors such as deBrunhoff, Lenski, Johnson and Rey are still among the great children's writers. It is hoped that this bibliography will aid in solving the problem of "What new books can I read to my children?"
